TRAILING THE COYOTE

By Robert North Bradbury

In the picture of Trailing the Coyote, that of the sheep ranch and the cattle country, Bill and Bob follow up one of the many trails of this weary brute, and having selected a well travelled run, they set their trap and erect a camouflage bath which insures passage of the animal over the concealed mechanism. The following morning shows the result of their careful laid plan, because Mr. Coyote is captured. It is a cowardly brute and its capture is readily effected. The entire proceedings are marked with care and caution, and show no unusual infliction, pain or injury. The captured Coyote is taken back to the camp in a sling.
